The General Election

BRITAIN'S DISMAL CHOICE

What We Think (pages 2 & 3)

WHAT WE THINK

Britain's dismal choice

It is General Election time again, thankfully with only a very few more days to go before the familiar farce is ended. And it is a farce too – one which the older ones amongst us have been witnessing for half a century or more. Today's names are different: Blair, Hague and Kennedy, instead of Wilson, Heath and Steel, as was the case 31 years ago, and Gaitskell, Macmillan and Grimond a decade or two before that. But otherwise very little has changed. We are hearing much the same empty slogans and promises masquerading as 'policies'. There is the usual appeal to every selfish and greedy instinct in the electorate. There is the same silly and childish level of debate over issues that should be discussed in an atmosphere of national responsibility and seriousness – only in 2001 that level has sunk several notches lower as the political careerists and placemen and -women tune themselves into the new 'dumbed-down' Britain. And not least, there is the studious avoidance of those issues most crucial to our national future – most notably immigration and race. On this we are not unmindful that the subject has been aired, but not in any adult way that contributes to a real understanding of what is at stake. The whole argument is about whether certain Tories, in expressing concerns about asylum-seekers, are being 'racist' or not – 'racism' being taken, axiomatically, to be an awful thing. There is a virtual taboo hanging over the question of whether the newcomers are going to add to or diminish the quality of Britain's population – which should be the key topic of our concern.

It is at moments like this that British people – young and not so young – should be taking a step back and focusing on what we might call the 'big picture'. By this we mean the depressing panorama of British history during the 56 years that have passed since the war that we were supposed to have fought for all that was noble and good; since the 'victory' that we celebrated over 'tyranny', over would-be 'foreign invaders' and for our national 'freedom'. The panorama is, of course, one in which none of the supposed purposes of that war have been achieved. We are ruled by tyrants, albeit petty ones, who can take a greengrocer to court for advertising his goods in British weights and measures, or prosecute a 12-year-old schoolboy who (obviously oblivious of his heinous 'crime') used a racial epithet in the course of a juvenile brawl. Foreign invaders have been flooding in in numbers never remotely contemplated at the time of Dunkirk. Our national 'freedom' is now a distant memory as our governors (and the word is chosen deliberately) enact legislation, much of it ludicrous beyond belief, handed down to them by what we can only describe as a Continental occupying power. What price now the sacrifices of 'The Few'?

And during this half-century we have seen a once-great nation degenerate in a hundred different but related ways: in its industrial competence and power; in its public and private morals; in the stability of its social order; in its intelligence, learning and culture; in the efficiency of its vital services; in the quality of its leadership and public administration; not least in its pride and confidence in itself. A measure of the latter is that we should now be earnestly debating whether our future lies in our being a colony of America or of Europe. These are the depths to which we have sunk in quite a short time, historically speaking.

And this is the focus in which the British public should be looking at things as there approaches yet another futile mass-popularity contest which will solve precisely nothing, which will leave us exactly where we were before and which is nothing but a gigantic dose of the old Roman prescription of bread and circuses, brought up to date with all the modern technological paraphernalia of television and popular entertainment passed off as 'politics' – of which so far Deputy Premier Prescott's brawl with a countryside protester has been the most riveting development.

It goes to illustrate that participation in the conventional modern political process – by which we mean choosing whether to vote for Labour, Tory or Liberal Democrat – is a complete waste of everyone's time. But what people should not deduce from this is that they should withdraw from politics per se into a kind of domestic isolation, highlighted only by TV soaps, gardening and football. This is a time when the British public needs to become more, rather than less, political. But it must be a kind of politics geared to bringing about vast and meaningful national change, not the purely superficial and cosmetic change registered as we swop one party of national twilight for another, one Westminster dummy for another Westminster dummy. This is what Britain has been doing during the lifetimes of all of us, and it has achieved nothing.

If something is to be achieved to arrest and reverse the continual downward spiral in national fortunes, we have got to be prepared to make some hard decisions, the first of which is to consider changes that in conventional political terms would be termed 'revolutionary', even 'extreme'. We have got to rid ourselves of the inhibitions and restraints formed by our desire to appear 'fashionable' and 'respectable'. Are we up to that challenge? Britain's future demands that we must be.

Voting in this election is completely futile except where there is a British National Party candidate standing. But much more important than voting is that people take some practical and realistic action which will give hope that they may create a better country to hand down to their children and grandchildren. There is such a course of action for those who want to follow it. Those who suggest otherwise are simply showing that they don't care – making excuses for apathy and laziness. They are the voting cattle who keep the old racket going.

An electoral policing operation

There was something curious about the handling of this year's May Day 'anti-capitalist' demonstrations in London by comparison with last year. Last year the police operation on the occasion was quite pathetic. Shaped obviously by the desire of 'New Labour' not to appear 'authoritarian' and 'repressive' and influenced, no doubt, by nostalgic memories of some members of the Government of their student days of the 1960s, the police on May 1st 2000 were clearly instructed to give licence to far-left mobsters to run amok in the Capital, smashing and looting property and attacking any passer-by who looked in the slightest way prosperous. The whole fiasco was symbolised by the scene we printed in these pages showing some irk urinating against a wall in Trafalgar Square while a squad of riot police stood by doing nothing.

This year things were very different. The police operation to control the rioters was in the main an efficient and no-nonsense one. A measure of its effectiveness was the cry of hysteria which went up from the Guardian-reading classes in protest against the mobsters being walled in by a solid phalanx of officers for several hours in the rain instead of being allowed to run amok and do as they liked.

Why the change of policy? Why the firm policing this year after the pussyfooting of the previous year? It would be nice to think that all this was for the right reasons. The reality, however, was almost certainly that Tony & Co. realised a general election was barely only a month away. The Government had to show that, for once, it was 'in charge'. We cannot expect this new approach to last for long.

The economy, stupid?

Those who fondly imagine that, despite the Government's many shortcomings, it presides over a thriving economy, should read a report that appeared in the Financial Times on the 27th April. This said that, according to a recent study by Warwick University Institute for Employment, no less than 700,000 manufacturing jobs are due to be lost in Britain over the next ten years.

On the other hand, the survey found, the employment of professional carers, such as children's nannies, was expected to grow by nearly the same amount – 650,000. This, according to the survey, was because of the large number of women expected to return to work after having children.

Mr. Robert Wilson, speaking for the survey team, said that the decline in manufacturing jobs did not mean that production would be going down, only that it would become more automated.

This of course glosses over the fact that a huge proportion of manufactured items now used in Britain are imported. Were it not for this, workers laid off through greater automation in one sector of manufacturing could be absorbed in other sectors. This is not possible under present conditions, however, because of globalisation, which constantly prices British manufacturers out of the market through cheaper foreign competition. Automation of the production process, which should be a boon, becomes a curse. In effect, 700,000 manufacturing jobs in Britain are going to go – but because of our enslavement to the global economy, not because of improved technology. This is a bleak prospect which the politicians no doubt would presently prefer not to talk about.

Bribes for going straight!

Tony Blair's latest policy for coping with crime surely exceeds the previous schemes even of his own government for its 'liberal' fatuity. In return for staying out of trouble, young offenders are to be rewarded with vouchers for clothes, music, travel or computer equipment.

The Prime Minister announced the new programme in late April in a speech to community leaders in Croydon in which he stressed his determination to improve the neighbourhoods and streets of the country's towns and cities.

We really have come to a low pass when we have a government which regards 'going straight' among young people as something of a special service qualifying for awards instead of what it should be: a duty of citizenship which everyone takes for granted. Will the next thing be medals for those who stay out of jail for, say, five years?

It's all down to us!

Want to know the origin of the CRE's arm-twisting of politicians to sign a pledge that they won't play the 'race card' in the coming General Election? Apparently, it all began with the British National Party's council election victory in London's Millwall back in 1993. In a report in The Times of the 24th April it was stated:-

"The Commission for Racial Equality came up with the race pledge after complaints about Liberal Democrat tactics during the Tower Hamlets contest in 1993, won by Derek Beackon for the British National Party."

Now that's nice to know!

PATHETIC!

MP's race surrender reveals shameful cowardice of Tory Party

WHEN retiring Tory MP for East Yorkshire John Townend spoke out against the vast changes wrought by immigration on Britain's Anglo-Saxon culture, and later condemned the turning of the British into a 'mongrel race', great numbers of people among the ordinary populace expressed agreement and admiration, and greater numbers still felt those sentiments even if they were reluctant to state them openly. Here at last was a politician – the first since Enoch Powell 33 years ago – prepared to speak the truth and risk the ostracism of the totalitarian race lobby dominant in parliament and the media.

The fact that Mr. Townend was at the end of his political career and was standing down as a member of parliament made his action rather less of a courageous gesture than it might otherwise have been: in effect, he had nothing to lose. But most folk these days are thankful for small mercies. At least he said something – which was better than his saying nothing.

But any admiration deserved by Mr. Townend was to be short-lived. His words generated the predictable outbreak of public hysteria, and this affected his own party no less than the others. Many in the party demanded his head. Here was where William Hague's leadership was put to the test.

Hague didn't even have to say he agreed with Townend; all he needed to do was defend the former East Yorks member's right to state his opinion in a democratic party. But even this was too much to ask of Willie. For some days he ran around like a headless chicken not knowing what to do.

The thing that finally decided him that he'd have to face Townend with the chop was the threat by black peer John Taylor to defect to Labour if the heretic did not either apologise or get expelled from the party.

And just who is John Taylor? What is his contribution to the nation's life that got him to the Lords? A big zero. He was put there solely as a sweetener after he had been rejected by the voters of Cheltenham and because of his colour. In fact, Taylor is just a nobody who has done nothing.

But his threat was enough to act as an explosive placed under Willie's backside. The Tory 'leader' jumped to Taylor's command and gave an ultimatum to the erring Towend: Apologise or you're out!

And what did Mr. Townend do? He meekly apologised.

Last month we heard from a supporter who in fact wrote to Mr. Townend congratulating him on speaking out as he did. In his reply Townend said: "I can assure you, I will not be gagged."

Brave words, which didn't last long!

This episode has told us something about John Townend, about William Hague and about the Conservative party. It has told us that the whole pack of them are utterly gutless.

When Britain's entire future is under threat from alien takeover, all these politicians can do is rush to their boltholes – terrified of one would-be black defector and of the ire of the race lobby.

It makes you want to vomit!

The things they're saying

The average Tory politician or commentator, insisting that immigration has been such a good thing, constantly cites the genuinely shining examples of the Huguenots and the Jews.

They hope you don't know how small the numbers involved were in both cases. Or that you will raise the point that they integrated into the British way of life, not just without trouble, but with enthusiasm – and without demanding any special privileges.

These Tories keep claiming all sorts of virtues for ethnic groups (Votes! Votes!). The native British rarely get a look in.

Robin Cook, our weirdo Foreign Secretary, claims or actually believes – which is worse – that Britain is a predominantly immigrant-descended population.

Untrue, of course. Until Commonwealth immigration, the last significant influx as a proportion of the population was the Normans, after 1066.

As a result of our relative absence of immigration, we developed a more homogeneous nation than probably anywhere else in Europe. Those who scorn that do not understand the world.

Corporal Stone's letter concerning homosexuality in the armed forces has prompted me to write... Your readers should be in no doubt that the bulk of the Army – officers and soldiers alike – do not consider the matter a non-issue, as has been reported in the press and elsewhere. Both are generally loyal to the chain of command yet seethe with resentment at the imposition of ill-conceived policies on homosexuality, equal opportunities and human rights.

Corporal Stone makes the point that we are not some social experiment to be exploited for the sake of political correctness or for liberal dabblers to experiment with. He is absolutely right: we are first and foremost a fighting force. Therefore we have no comparable profession in civilian life and consequently have no requirement whatsoever for civilian working practices and standards. Sadly, this point seems to have been lost, not just on our politicians, but regrettably also at senior command level.

As the parents of a director of Cammell Laird, we would just like to point out how hard the dedicated board has worked to keep the company afloat and safeguard the jobs of the workforce. Their families have had to take a back seat.

Our son has not had a holiday for two years and has spent many nights away from home as he went any and everywhere to secure work for the yards.

The company was restarted in 1993 from nothing. Our daughter-in-law, though not employed by the company, worked nights and weekends for many months without pay or reward just to help the company grow.

Since then, hundreds of apprentices have served their time and tens of millions of pounds have been pumped into the Merseyside and North East economies, but all the hard work, dedication and loyalty has come to nothing.

The blame must be placed firmly and squarely on the shoulders of the Government, which has given work to European shipyards that receive money and help, while not one finger has been raised and not one penny given to help a valiant workforce and dedicated board of directors.

Back in the early 1950s the Tory Government had ignored all warnings about the danger television posed to culture, and had licenced commercial television. It did not seem to occur to them that high culture, with its respect for learning, order, hierarchy and tradition, was their friend. The spread of wealth did not – as it should have done – mean that more and more people were able to enjoy a more thoughtful, literate and civilised life. The opposite happened. With television profitably cheering it on, the trash culture of coarseness and public humiliation spread upwards. Once, Welsh miners formed Bach choirs and studied Shakespeare because they wanted a more abundant world; now the wealthy suburbs watch Big Brother and The Weakest Link.

If there is one outstanding feature of this government it is its uncanny ability to identify the social issues which need attention – and then screw them up. It has understood that child poverty and welfare state dependency are blots on the social landscape. But its solutions end up making the original problems even worse.

The baby bonds wheeze is but the latest example. The government is absolutely right to want to encourage people to save. It is right to worry that the poor don't do so. The problem is that the baby bonds, which are supposed to usher in a savings culture among the poor, are not savings at all.

Instead, the state will give everyone between £400 and £800 by the time they are 18-21 to build up into a modest nest egg. This will not be money they have carefully put aside. It is public money: other people's money... the bonds will represent automatic largesse at public expense.

WHY DO WE NEED 'STAR WARS'?

The US anti-missile system that Britain is buying into, says JOHN TYNDALL, is geared to an international scenario rooted in fantasy ENOCH POWELL once said, dismissively, that the cardinal rule of British foreign policy in the post-1945 period has been to find out what America wants us to do, and then do it. This observation was brought to mind last month when it was announced that Prime Minister Blair was in favour of committing Britain to participation in the enormously expensive 'Star Wars' anti-missile defence system recently approved by US President George W. Bush.

'Star Wars' is the more popular name for the 'National Missile Defence', described in the Daily Mail of the 3rd May as "a system of space satellites, earth-based radar tracking stations and anti-missile batteries designed to detect and shoot down rockets targeted against America and its allies." The system is in fact an upgrade of one already existing. The present system gives early-warning information about missiles directed at the United States but does not track them accurately enough to allow a defensive missile system to intercept them, one of the reasons being that this would contravene the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty signed by the USA and others in 1972. The upgrade, as constituted by the Star Wars programme, would grant this facility and thus violate the treaty. This has, not unnaturally, caused world-wide concern. China and a host of smaller powers have objected on the grounds that it would revive and escalate the arms race. Other EU countries are known to be lukewarm with regard to any support for Bush. Britain, as usual, is inclined to toe the American line – though with loud opposition expected from the pacifist wing of the Labour Party. The Tories, predictably, support the plan, criticising Blair only for his slowness and equivocation in coming round to the Americans' point of view.

Cost to Britain's defence

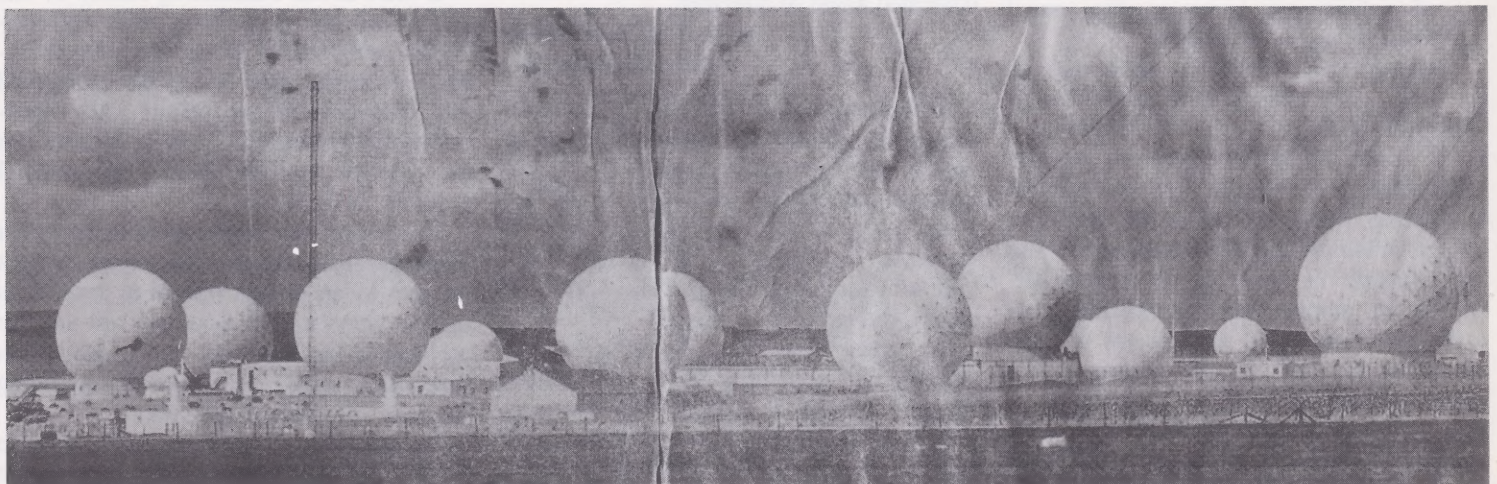

Though the main expense of Star Wars would be borne by the Americans, the cost of Britain's contribution to it would be considerable. A provisional estimate is £150 million, but all such estimates tend to be well below the real figure. Lord Chalfont, a defence spokesman, said in a TV discussion on May 6th that it would almost certainly necessitate the ditching of yet further regiments and huge cuts in existing conventional weapons programmes. And all this is at a time when we have a Government that seems determined to strip bare the modest armed forces the nation forces with rifles that constantly misfire, ships that cannot put to sea for lack of fuel and a large portion of fighting aircraft grounded because of absence of maintenance. The British Army now has fewer than 100,000 troops – the first time it has been in such a situation since 1793, when our population was less than a fifth of today.

Set against this background, a decision to allocate huge resources to the Star Wars programme would have to be justified by exceptionally strong arguments in terms of its strategic need. So just what arguments are Mr. Bush and his British backers offering?

The 'rogue states'

Since the end of the 'Cold War' – an international face-down that was always more apparent than real – our rulers have been forced to devise new arguments for NATO and the vast and complicated trans-continental defence structure maintained under US domination virtually since the end of World War II. The main argument they offer is to cite what they usually refer to as the so-called 'rogue states' – meaning such 'powers' as Iraq, North Korea, Libya and sundry other Islamic nations which are presumed to be willing and able to launch missile attacks on the United States or other western countries. And just in case the size of these states makes such a scenario seem rather far-fetched, Red China is sometimes thrown in for good measure. No doubt, Serbia would be included were there the slightest evidence that she had the capacity for such action.

Our defence or that of the New World Order? Above is the early-warning station at Menwith Hill in Yorkshire. Nominally an RAF base and under British control, it is effectively an outpost of the American empire and, like the Fylingdales station 70 miles away, an instrument serving to consolidate the domination of the globalist élite. Both Menwith Hill and Fylingdales would be front-line targets in any retaliatory action by a state attacked on order from the élite – without Britain having any say in the matter. It is also less well known that the communications system at Menwith Hill is used to spy on political dissidents, including probably British Nationalists!

The argument is that the rulers and governments of these states are essentially erratic and unstable, hostile to western values and hence liable at any time to 'nuke' America or one of her so-called allies.

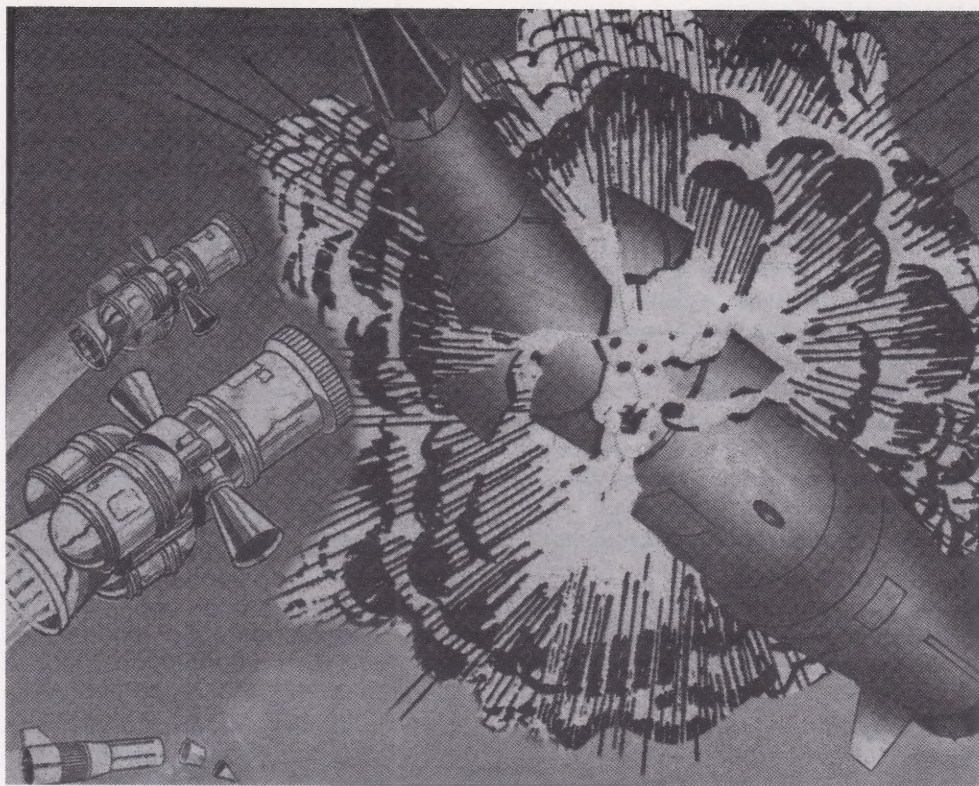

In fact, the idea belongs to fantasy – a fantasy so ludicrous that a child ought to be able to see through it. For a start, the truth is that a number of the allegedly 'unstable' states are much more stable than either the US or the other western democracies. Instead of swapping governments every few years, they mostly have strong rulers who have behaved with a fair amount of consistency over a long period of time. Saddam Hussein of Iraq and Gadaffi of Libya have been in power for almost as long as any of us care to remember. The methods they use to ensure they stay there may not be pleasing to those in the 'liberal' West, but there is a great deal of evidence that they continue to have the bulk of their populations behind them. Whatever the morality of their politics, what they most certainly are not is fools. Men who could survive as long as they have must be skilled practitioners of realpolitik, and as such would not be found embarking on crazy ventures far from home.

And crazy ventures are exactly what attacks on the United States and its allies would most certainly be. China apart, these so-called 'rogue states' are all very much in the minor league of powers on the international stage. Their rulers would have to be insane beyond all imagination to fire missiles, not only at the USA, but at countries of the stature of France, Germany – and even Britain in her present militarily puny condition. Just what would such attacks profit them? Their rulers – almost to a man realists of an order far superior to their western counterparts – know the answer clearly.

Who are the real rogues?

And even accepting the wild hypothesis that such a state and ruler as envisaged in all this 'rogue' propaganda might decide to commit national and personal suicide by launching such an attack, should we not ask ourselves how we could come to such a situation where there is this enmity towards the West – and particularly the United States – among the countries concerned? Hostility to western values there may most certainly be; the moral degeneracy of life in the western democracies is indeed not an example that Islamic leaders – to take one category – wish to see their peoples emulate. But much more crucial is the fact that the leaders of the so-called 'rogue states', far from accepting this appellation, in fact see things in the very reverse perspective. To them, it is America and its lackeys, especially Britain, that are the real rogues. It is we, they believe, who threaten them, rather than the other way round.

Is this view a reasonable one? To evaluate

MOMENT OF IMPACT

The Star Wars illustration here shows the 'kill vehicles', having split from their rocket carrier, hitting the attacking missile. Star Wars technology, however, could become out of date as missiles are equipped with detection devices which cause them to split into separate parts on the rocket's approach, resulting in only one part being destroyed.

it, let us remind ourselves that ever since the Gulf War in 1990-91 the Americans, with Britain in tow, have been carrying out hostile operations by air against Iraq – despite the fact that that country poses no conceivable security danger to either of us. Let us also consider the recent incident in which a US spy plane was forced down onto Hainan Island – Chinese territory. Just what was the plane doing there? The area was many thousands of miles from the United States. And are there Chinese spy planes cruising up and down the California Coast? If so, we would most certainly be hearing about them, and we would be witnessing President Bush engaging in angry exchanges with the Chinese Government over such 'intolerable' incursions into America's rightful sphere of influence (remember the Monroe Doctrine?). And yet when the Chinese express strong displeasure over the Hainan incident, which led to the death of one of their pilots, they are accused in the western press as throwing unreasonable tantrums. We seem to be heading for an Orwellian scenario in which falsehood becomes 'truth', a defensive response becomes 'aggression' and irredentist excursions far from home become necessary precautions taken in the interests of 'national security'.

But we should not have been surprised. Mr. Bush, for instance, regards Taiwan as a quite legitimate sphere of interest for the United States. He is on record as saying that where his Government is concerned that island would be defended "with whatever it took." Now this is a quite extraordinary statement for an American president to make. Taiwan has across the centuries been an integral part of China. Its people are ethnically Chinese almost down to the last man and woman. In other words, it stands in relation to China much as the Isle of Wight stands to Britain. It became separated from mainland China politically after Mao Tse Tung's takeover of the latter in 1949. The Taiwan Chinese did not want to become communist, and therein lay the division. For a decade now, eventual unification with the mainland has been official Taiwanese policy. Only the terms are a matter of dispute. Whatever our opinions about Chinese Communism as such, the fact is that governments of mainland China have a perfectly reasonable claim to Taiwan as part of their national territory, and in the circumstances have been extremely patient over the past half-century in not forcing this issue more stridently than they have. Whether Taiwan will be united with the rest of China by consent or conquest remains to be seen, but in whatever event the matter is a Chinese affair – to be decided by the Chinese. It is not our business and it is not America's business, but American governments long before Bush have repeatedly behaved as if it is. So the question must again be asked: is China the rogue state in seeking to restore Chinese Taiwan to its historical, traditional and racial homeland – or is the US the rogue state in threatening to stop her? Again, we might revert to the question of the Isle of Wight – or, to deal with things in an American context, let us suppose that Alaska, for instance, had become politically separated from the United States just as it is geographically separated. What would Britain or America think if some foreign power took it upon itself to interfere in the very proper action of either to restore the separated territory to the mother nation? Yet it is precisely China's clear intent to see Taiwan reunited to the Chinese mainland that puts her in the category of 'rogue state', which must be spied on. It's a strange world we live in!

Contd. overleaf

WHY DO WE NEED 'STAR WARS'?

'Human rights' claptrap

Of course, liberals and globalists who like to use such expressions as 'rogue state' would protest that this is not the only one of China's sins. They would no doubt cite what they claim to be her bad record over 'human rights' and such abstractions. Well, maybe. But does a country's disregard for what we or the Americans think are 'human rights' justify sending spy planes within close proximity to its territory, least of all spending billions on sophisticated weapons systems in 'defence' against it?

Daily Mail columnist Andrew Alexander – most definitely not one of those newspaper writers suffering from the customary visceral anti-Americanism of the silly left – put it aptly in an article on May 4th:-

"To many foreign governments the Americans merely appear bullies, anxious to see their business interests expanded.

"As for the missile defence shield, that would give the US an invulnerability against other nuclear powers that would make it more prone than ever to play the role of global bully.

"Suppose the US had already established its missile shield. You could be sure that an American promise to safeguard Taiwan with 'whatever it took' would be seen as – and possibly stated as – a clear threat to use nuclear weapons."

All very true, but the question remains: why? Mr. Alexander's reference to 'business interests' might be not entirely without justification but it surely does not explain everything. John Laughland, writing in The Spectator of August 12th last year, was much closer to the mark. In an article titled 'We are only obeying orders', Laughland put under the microscope America's policy of bombing Iraq referred to earlier in this article. The United States, he said, was totally committed to the goal of globalism – of a 'one world' in which free nation-states would no longer exist. The structures, he said, which previously were maintained to defend the liberty of nations...

"... have been hijacked from within and transmogrified, by Bill Clinton and Madeleine Albright, into instruments for the very opposite: the creation of a single global power system of limited national sovereignty. The internationalism for which left-wingers, especially old communists like Peter Mandelson, have spent their lives fighting, has now become the official policy of the White House and the State department, while all the old nostrums which used to be the preserve of Marxists – internationalism, universal human rights, a world without borders, the withering away of the state – have now become explicit US and Western policy."

The only point over which one might argue with Laughland is his implication that post-war US policy has ever been any different: that previous to the Clinton/Albright era American military power was deployed for nobler purposes, such as the 'liberty of nations', as he put it. However, this is a detail which should not detract from the truth of his analysis. It is globalism that is the policy behind the bombing of Iraq. It is globalism that underlies the incessant interference in the conflicts of former Yugoslavia. And it is globalism that provides the key motif behind the Star Wars programme which Britain seems about to follow with all the slavish sycophancy that has characterised her relations with the United States since Churchill proclaimed himself the "ardent lieutenant" of President Franklin D. Roosevelt back in World War II.

Of course, in a deeper sense the globalist dream is itself a fantasy – as much a fantasy as the prospect of mini-powers firing missiles at the United States: it will never be realised. The real world is a world of nation-states, forever engaged in competition for advantage, sometimes peacefully, sometimes by force of arms. In pursuit of this globalist fantasy world, we gravely weaken ourselves in our ability to survive in the real world.

Counter-measures

And as far as Star Wars is concerned, it is doubtful whether its value will ever be much more than psychological. It will not be long before the missiles against which it is aimed will be equipped with warning devices which will enable them to anticipate the approach of the defensive rocket and split into numerous smaller missiles, only one of which it can hit and destroy. History should have told us, again and again, that for every new piece of war technology there is always, sooner or later, a counter-technology. So it is likely to be with the Star Wars programme. However, as long as Star Wars is intended to intimidate rather than actually be put into action, most probably this does not bother its enthusiasts overmuch!

One likely impact on Britain will be that America's anti-missile upgrade will be incorporated into the warning systems at Fylingdales and Menwith Hill in Yorkshire. If we really take seriously the idea that the 'rogue states' will be firing missiles in a westerly direction, there is a good chance that these stations – nominally RAF bases but effectively outposts of the United States – will be in the front line. But much more serious is the fact that the huge funding of the programme to which Britain will be expected to contribute will impose crippling financial burdens on us – burdens which we already have advance notice will lead to yet further cuts in our conventional defence capacity. In as much as defence planning has to be based on a perception of the most likely war scenarios of the future, all historical evidence – long past and much more recent – points to Britain having to be prepared for Falklands-type conflicts in which national, not global, interests are at stake. Already our forces have been emasculated to a degree that would render another Falklands operation quite impossible. Now, it seems, this process is to be taken a step further, with what is left of our arms budget lavished on a programme of questionable utility which has nothing whatever to do with the defence of the realm or any of its overseas areas of responsibility.

We will, if Blair and the Tories have their way, be making an all-or-bust investment in President Bush's schemes for a One World state, dominated by Washington, defended by Washington and dancing to the tune of Washington (for just as long as it lasts).

Is this what the Thin Red Line at Waterloo fought for, what Nelson turned his blind eye for and the Battle of Britain pilots took to the air for? I think not.

Some advice
from
Dr. WILLIAM
L. PIERCE

The following is taken from an internal bulletin published monthly by the National Alliance, which can be located at PO Box 90, Hillsboro, WV 24946, U.S.A. We reproduce it because it contains some thoughts which we believe will be valuable to our readers.

The world judges us not by what we are but by what we seem.

That is why it is necessary for our published materials to be as nearly perfect as we can make them. We want to seem to the world to be professional, capable, careful. If a member, in his haste to get a leaflet distributed in response to a local situation, puts out material that looks amateurish or that uses the English language poorly, the discriminating men and women among that portion of the world that sees the leaflet will judge us to be amateurs or illiterates. And really, it is the discriminating men and women we are most eager to recruit. The ability to discriminate and the habit of discriminating are prerequisites for individual success. And it is upon our ability to recruit successful people that our success as an organisation will depend.

If there is anything more important to our image than professionalism, it is strength. To the world we must always seem strong, never weak. That is the reason why we welcome most media publicity; despite the lies and the hostility of the media, their current fashion is to portray us as stronger than we are, with the aim of making the lemmings fear and hate us more. If we seem strong, however, we are respected, even by those who hate us; and, what is much more important, it is necessary for us to have the respect of those whom we seek to recruit. If we seem weak, then no-one respects us, and the only people who will want to associate themselves with us are those who have the wrong motivations and with whom we don't want to be associated.

I will quote a portion of a letter I received a few days ago from a member in Idaho who is an attorney:-

"I am writing concerning an incident at a meeting I attended last week in Coeur d'Alene, Idaho. I was at the meeting with a group of professionals from around the state. Morris Dees (a notorious American 'anti-racist' agitator. Ed.) was giving his annual speech that evening to a sold-out crowd of 500 people. The motel was replete with uniformed and plain-clothes officers. The main road in front of the motel was lined with more than 50 patrol cars with their lights flashing. Outside the motel on a side street was a group of five men, who I later learned were Richard Butler and four skinheads in leathers and chains. There was a swarm of TV cameras around them. They were protesting Dees's speech. "The people around me were unanimous in expressing their hatred for Richard Butler. Not one person mentioned Butler's constitutional right of free speech. I was the only person who expressed any support by commenting that it took balls to do what his group was doing.

"The point of my letter is that they looked weak and pathetic. They were a freak show. No white person in his right mind would associate with them or even listen to them. I know that I wouldn't if I hadn't been educated already by the National Alliance. The white movement must stop showing itself in public until a group can assemble which shows strength. Until then, any public showing hurts the movement, just like Butler's freak show.

"White people want to see well-groomed and well-dressed men who show professionalism and strength. Bottom line: the public will follow a group that shows strength. More important: people of quality will take notice of strength, and those are the people we are trying to reach."

Of course, he is absolutely correct. Richard Butler is an honest and courageous man who gave everything for what he believed in, and lost everything. But the people he attracted were too often weak people - losers, ne'er-do-wells, jailbirds, crazies, substance abusers, retards - and they made up his public image. That image kept away from him the people he needed in order to be effective.

Perhaps the public should be able to see beneath the superficial image to the substance inside; perhaps the public should be able to recognise truth no matter how it is packaged. The fact is, most members of the public can't. They see only the image, not what is behind the image. This inability to see behind the image is characteristic of discriminating, successful people too: the professionals attending the Dees lecture in Coeur d'Alene, for example.

Professionalism and strength are the two essential elements of our image. We can maintain the image of professionalism by maintaining a high degree of control over our publications. We can avoid an image of weakness by not engaging in ill-advised public activities of the sort that our attorney member saw outside the Dees lecture. Public demonstrations with 25 or 30 of our members and supporters and 500 hostile counter-demonstrators project an image of weakness. If we must engage in public demonstrations at this time, let us choose our venue and our cause with care and plan the demonstration in detail. The time will come later when we can much more easily engage in demonstrations that project an image of strength.

Our Editor's comments

Dr. PIERCE'S analysis of what constitutes good imagery in politics is notable for what it does not say just as for what it says. It will be observed that nowhere does he mention the dilution of policies and political ideas so as to make them seem 'softer', 'gentler', more 'moderate'. He correctly gauges that members of the general public, when they recoil from a particular political movement, do so primarily because they perceive it to be small, weak, insignificant, even pathetic. This is the reason why ideas that were not considered 'extreme' half a century or a century ago are considered 'extreme' today - because those espousing them do not any longer have the big battalions - of press, TV and politics - on their side, not because of any intrinsic undesirability about them.

For the same reason, those who imagine that they will suddenly find the fast track to public support by presenting themselves as choirboys and their ideas in a much watered-down form are going to be sadly disillusioned. As long as this 'gentler' image goes hand-in-hand with weakness, they are going to be despised and rejected.

This is not a summons to nationalists to adopt 'yobbish behaviour or conduct themselves with exaggerated aggression; on the contrary, they should, as Dr. Pierce's colleague advises, be well-groomed and well-dressed. They should be polite to those to whom they speak, even in the face of hostility. What it does mean is that they should not compromise their policies nor dilute the strength of their ideas in pursuit of the phantom of greater popularity.

Dr. Pierce is also right in stressing the importance of professionalism - that is to say the presentation of an image of efficiency and competence. Counter-productive to this is shoddy, toilet-paper-type literature, written in bad English and full of mistakes in spelling, grammar and punctuation. When members of the public notice that the promotional aids used by nationalist organisations demonstrate that they are produced by intelligent, capable and skilled people, those aids will take on a 'respectability' that they would not otherwise possess. As Dr. Pierce makes clear, strength and efficiency are the keystones in effective propaganda and recruitment. JHT.

LIKE IT OR NOT, modern-day marketing principles apply to political parties and their proposals just as much as to the business of flogging soap powder. This is witnessed by the massive sums of money spent by the globalist parties on advertising. Their advertising can be assessed by a quick perusal as being most often negative – that is denigrating the party perceived to be the greatest menace to their retention of lucrative positions. Alternatively, they will occasionally make vague claims to be acting for our people – mostly downright lies [spin] which many folk are beginning to see through.

It is important to study the format and effectiveness of the globalists' advertising in order to assess the potential for the British National Party to reap advertising benefit, given its limited financial resources.

Advertising principles require that one's brand name is well known. Fairly obvious, you may think, but just consider how much money is spent to launch a new product and get its name into the mind of the consumer – millions of pounds, on billboards, in newspapers and on the electronic brain-washer, television.

How long does it take to get the name of the British National Party known? Some people still say, whenever the issue of race comes up: "Oh, you sound like the National Front." This is a fading phenomena but it proves the point. The BNP has been around nearly twenty years and is the biggest and most effective nationalist party in Britain – and some people don't know it yet. This, despite the extensive coverage given to the BNP by the Biased Broadcasting Corporation and other propaganda hate machines of our globalist government.

So, conclusion number one for the British National Party, or any other nationalist party around the world, is: don't change your name!

Anyone even suggesting such a course is doing the cause a great disservice. It smacks of treason – the under-hand betrayal. Be suspicious of anyone touting this proposal, although some may do it with good intent.

Why should I consider it necessary to raise this point?

Well, this is where we get into the question of 'image' – another word for branding, including how you are perceived, and its effect on positioning. Positioning is which part of the market you aim at and to how much of it you appeal.

ABOUT BRANDING AND POSITIONING

This is also affected by brand differentiation, how one is perceived as different to another.

All these things are working for the image-projection

in politics

BNP – with the kind assistance of the globalists.

Let's look at why it is necessary for the party to keep its name at all costs.

Image change won't work

Some people say that if only we could have a nice 'friendly' image, because our policies are so sound people would vote for us and we would win. Let us change our name because it's got a 'bad' image attached to it, then everything will be OK!

A basic grasp of marketing and an awareness of the wickedness embodied in the globalist traitors, together with a review of nationalist history, should spark realisation in the simplest of minds that this just "ain't gonna work."

For those who might need a refresher, it's the establishment's media hate machine which gives nationalist parties the 'bad image', and this is done because those controlling the machine are afraid of our policies. Your name is your name; it is its association with negative images which temporarily restrains people from voting for you – and, note, this is not totally effective [The reason for this is another subject]. The media would think nothing of spending another few billion pounds (including the BBC licence-payers' money) to do a similar hatchet job on the Squeaky Clean Nationalist Party, the new Butter-Wouldn't-Melt-in-Our-Mouth Nationalist Party or any other party name you may care to concoct. For proof, just look around the world; if it's nationalist its name is smeared. Why?, because nationalism is the only real alternative to the globalist consensus of the ic New World Odour.

If you want a good image, change your policies to those of treason and appeasement, be prepared to lick a... – and you might not even get to power then. Look at the liberals!

The upside is that the globalists won't say mean things about you and hurt your feelings. Unfortunately you won't save your folk or your nation either, but what's that compared to the approval of traitors?

I think I've made my point; it only surprises me it should need repeating every few years.

So, we're going to keep the name 'British National Party', no matter what. Be proud of it!

So what about our 'bad image', which holds us back?

To which I would reply: what bad image? The party's image is part of its market positioning and – much, much more important – its brand differentiation.

And this is where we get to the really good bit; I bet any traitors reading the next few paragraphs will bite right through their lips.

The globalist parties are using marketing concepts ahead of political debate to attract voters.

And they apply the same concepts to the BNP when they arrange media hatchet jobs.

In order to

WELL-ESTABLISHED BRAND

It has taken many years to make the BNP and its roundel nationally known. It would be folly to change it now.

capture the greatest market, commercially, it is desirable to position one's product at a point called the 'norm'. That is in mid-market with the greatest catchment width. All of the globalist parties try to do this. The BNP is, through hatchet-job TV programmes, pushed outside the norm position.

Brand Differentiation

Now, this is where we come to our friend called 'Brand Differentiation'.

People 'choose' one brand rather than another because they perceive a difference – or differences. These are known as Unique Selling Propositions [USPs]. The USPs are raised in their minds as benefits which they find desirable and can accrue to them from choosing a particular brand.

The more differences, the more benefits. And it is preferable that the different product has an emotional attribute.

Anyone starting to notice the BNP and its policies being covered here? It gets better.

When more than one brand seeks to occupy the norm position, or squabble over it, as the globalist parties do, the effect is to nullify perceived differences. When consumers are confronted by products which resemble one another in terms of Unique Selling Propositions – that is to say there is very little discernible difference, or even none at all, between them – the consumer (in this case the British voter) begins to look elsewhere for something different.

Ah! Give us proof, you say. Reassure us!

OK, look at the fall-off in turnout at the polling stations since the Labour and Conservative parties betrayed their traditional supporters and invested in globalism. Listen to their words and they all sound the same. They seek and actively engage each other for the 'middle ground'; they even use these same words.

This tendency by the main parties of betrayal removes, in the mind of the voter, any differences. How many people have you heard say: "Oh, they're all the same" or "I'm not voting – there's no difference"?

I encourage you to go around saying the same thing, and then add: "So this time I'm voting BNP." I throw this in as an aside.

The truly cynical will now ask why, if these invisible market forces are at work, have not the people turned to the BNP?

The answer is simple. Many do vote BNP. Many others do not have a chance because there is no candidate. However, in as much as so many people are boycotting the globalist parties you are already witnessing the scenario taking place...

For many, the BNP is the next move. They have already stopped voting for the globalist parties. The first part of the process has taken effect. There is no discernible difference between the three globalist parties, and so the consumers refuse to make a choice. Labour, Conservative and Liberal Democrat politicians and media pundits call it 'voter apathy'; the idiots don't seem to know (or will not admit) that there's more to it than that, and that what is turning the voters off is lack of any real alternative.

Now the voters need to find out that what they seek is what the BNP has – and then the niche market [a definition follows] begins to expand. The voters will come to the BNP; it will establish a new competitive norm. The competition will start to take on some of the USPs of the new norm. It's been happening for some time – for example, the Tories [at least some of them] on race, the left on global trade. Note the fear of others to discuss race – they know that they cannot win in this market.

Syphoning attempt

The introduction of the UKIP [United Kingdom Independence Party] by the globalists was an attempt to syphon off support moving towards the new norm being created by the BNP [and reinforced by government smears]. Look how much it cost – millions of pounds. It worked, temporarily. It also served to move people away from their usual brand. Once brand loyalty is broken down, the search is on for a replacement.

What all this means is that the market is moving the BNP's way. Notice that image changes are only ever advocated after the party has had successes. Its successes come, in part, because of what some believe to be its 'bad image' – which I would say is simply another image. People support a party while it has a 'bad image', so why should they believe that an image change would improve things for others? Beware the 'image-change' advocate!

At present the BNP is appealing to a niche market. That is, a market which is a specialist market. A market which lies outside the norm, but this is changing. Niche markets can be expanded, and by their very nature they draw in the best, most adventurous and most discriminating people first [no pun intended!].

It is precisely the actions of the globalists in squabbling over the middle ground – while simultaneously generating propaganda lies to push perceptions of the BNP away from that position – that work in favour of the BNP.

The BNP does not have the finances nor access to the media lie machines but it does have 'folk-speak'.

Folk-speak is what people talk about in clubs, pubs at work and in the home. You know, for instance, that Hoover is a brand of vacuum cleaner, but the name is used for all vacuum cleaners. That is folk-speak. Companies spend millions of pounds to make their products household names, but the media hate machines do it for the BNP for nothing!

Don't worry that they attempt to smear the BNP. Intelligent people already distrust the blighters, and the distrust is growing.

To people in the BNP I would say: be pleased to be different. It works for you!

Just keep doing what you are doing and the voters will come to you. Most of all, do not get neurotic about the party's 'image' but maintain your stance on principle. It is your main USP, and the globalists do not have it; worse for them, they are perceived by most people to have no principles at all. It is a difference, a reason to 'buy' your product, remember?

You can show what liars the media hate machines are simply by being a nice, clean pleasant and polite representative of your party – a bit of practical image-enhancement. Once you start to do that, the credibility of the hate machines will fall away at an exponential rate, evidenced by Derek Beacon's increased vote second time around.

Finally, research proves that when consumers are at a loss to find any real differences upon which to base their choices they turn to their long-term memories to provide alternatives, which do provide differences, from which to make their choice...

Enter a BNP, which has not changed its name, or image, and offers many different policies for the regeneration of Britain.

FRIENDS OF SPEARHEAD

Friends of Spearhead is a support group that has been formed for the purpose of ensuring our magazine's continued survival in new circumstances in which it is going to be facing reduced sales and advertising through the British National Party network due to the decision of the party leadership to launch a new and separate magazine.

Members of Friends of Spearhead will be asked to pay a subscription of a minimum of £10 a month, in return for which they may, if they wish, receive five copies of each monthly issue for redistribution (by whatever means they prefer). This subscription may be paid by ordinary cheque or by direct debit, in which case details of our bank and account number will be supplied on request.

In addition, Friends of Spearhead will be undertaking certain other promotions, details of which will be advertised as they occur.

The end of multi-culturalism?

BRITAIN is not a 'multi-cultural' society, and could not be one even if its people wished it.

The only people who say otherwise are the politicians and the media, who together comprise the oligarchs who run this hapless country.

Take the comments of Peter Riddell, a leading liberal journalist whose generic opinions mirror largely those of his cohorts in the press, many of whom use the same type of syntax and adopt the same air of self-righteousness. Riddell criticised MP John Townend's claim that "our homogenous Anglo-Saxon society has been seriously undermined by massive immigration..." That view, said Riddell, "is not only obnoxious but is also historical nonsense on a vast scale."

Yet on other occasions Riddell and his cohorts have said: "Britain is a multi-cultural society." If so, then clearly there is not one culture but many, and Townend is therefore right. Dr. David Coleman, the Oxford academic demographer, wrote: "The claim that the British population has been transformed radically by post-war immigration seems no more than the truth... immigration is ceasing to be a matter to be discussed freely... the acceptability of comment on major political issues such as this should not be a matter of taste, or of nervousness about giving offence, only of truth and evidence."

Richard Hoggart, a respected veteran commentator on British cultural trends, wrote in his The Way We Live Now: "The phrase 'We are now a multicultural society...' is often aggressively and loosely used, as though the speaker thinks Britain is by now a patchwork of several roughly equal ethnic and religious groups."

Riddell and others have hoist themselves on their own petard far too often in the race and immigration debate. Their generic liberal opinions are frequently based on factually incorrect assumptions. "Britain has long been a diverse society," say most journalists. Yet the immigrants only started coming here from the 1950s onwards, so Britain has only recently become a diverse society.

SELF-CONTRADICTION

They say that multi-culturalism is 'enriching'. Yet their own press stories reveal a sordid world of ethnic crime and alienation, race tribunals and communal resentment. Now they have dropped that angle, and say instead that we need millions more immigrants to fulfil labour shortages. But in a crowded country like Britain the social and economic disbenefits vastly outweigh any benefits. Millions more houses and schools will have to be built to accommodate the new arrivals, many of whom will be dependents and their families.

The argument could be put more simply: we do not need more immigrants because

Despite the barrage of liberal propaganda
on race, says
ANTONY MILNE,
world trends are working in the opposite direction

we do not need the goods or services most of them provide. There is a glut of cars, electronic gadgets, clothes, food and commodities of all kinds. Sweatshop industries exist because crooked entrepreneurs want to make a fast buck by trying to undercut national pay rates and world commodity prices.

The problem is that most journalists are not people of much intellect and simply cannot handle the dramatic social and racial changes that have overtaken this country in such a short space of time. They fail to realise that ethnic minorities are members of 'diasporas'. One Asian wrote to the press recently saying that:

"We have not come here as Asians and Africans but as Britons." This is clearly not the case, since London is now full of first-generation Africans and Indians who retain their own passports. They are not even 'British' in the legal sense.

Worse, the media fail to see that immigration is a political issue, and is the direct result not of 'globalizing' trends but of unchecked governmental policies. This is why media people should beware of the word 'racism'. It is not a word used by the general public itself, and neither is it used among Third World peoples, where ethnic and tribal tensions are often rife.

No other ethnic nation has tried with such desperation to disconnect nationality from race purely for the benefit of the diaspora communities they have allowed in.

OUR REAL ORIGINS

Robin Cook, the Foreign Secretary, declares to the world that Britain's strength lies in its 'multi-cultural origins', the recent Third World immigrants just adding to an already rich stock. The Americans seem to know better. A briefing note at the website of the US State Department said recently: "Contemporary Britons are descended mainly from the varied ethnic stocks that settled there before the 11th century. The pre-Celtic, Celtic, Roman, Anglo-Saxon and Norse influences were blended in Britain under the Normans, (the) Scandinavian Vikings who had lived in northern France."

A PICTURE THAT TELLS ITS OWN STORY

This is a scene from Bradford during the recent racial trouble there. The hostile looks on the faces of these young Asians are indicative of a still strong tribal attitude. The truth is that they have not integrated, and largely do not want to integrate, into British society.

That a leading British politician tells lies about the kind of people he is governing and has to be put right by foreigners testifies to the growing régime-like character of this country. Not a single British journalist has contradicted Cook's remarks.

One problem is the dumbing down of the British media. Britain now has no serious daily journal akin to Le Monde or the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung. As a result, the kind of writer employed by British papers has changed. What we get now is just someone who has gone on a media course and has only a cursory knowledge of world cultures and foreign affairs.

POLITICALLY CORRECT JUDGES

Apart from media bias, several other features have contributed to Britain's immigration fiasco. Judges are now allowing illegal immigrants to stay in this country despite the Home Secretary's attempt to remove them (this growing politicization of the judiciary has taken even liberals by surprise).

Nation, nâ'shun, n. a body of people born of the same stock: the people inhabiting the same country, or under the same government: a race: a great number: an old division of students in universities. [Fr., - L. nationem - nasci, natus, to be born.]

From Chambers's Twentieth Century Dictionary, pub. 1933.

Secondly, the Commission for Racial Equality (CRE) is a powerful executive Trojan Horse whose sole purpose is to determine the direction of Britain's immigration policy. Other European politicians have not restricted their own autonomy in this way.

And only in Britain is the immigration issue discussed on the nation's airwaves with the ethnic minorities themselves who represent the sending countries. In other European countries asylum and immigration issues are discussed by indigent commentators, acting as spokesmen for the actual receiving communities.

Now there is pressure from the wider community for more openness about immigration issues. This suggestion greatly embarrasses the media, constantly hectoring authoritarian states for suppressing unfavourable opinions. Belatedly, the chiefs of the media are beginning to realize that they are fast getting out of kilter with not only European intellectuals but with what is happening in the rest of the world.

'Multiculturalism' is increasingly viewed as an outdated 20th century concept, the product of the totalitarian (communist) mass movements that tried to remould, 'modernise' and politicise their societies. In the process, of course, they brought war, dislocation and oppression to Europe.

Professor Samuel Huntington says the West is in decline because its liberal élite has confused 'modernization' with 'westernization', when the latter actually means European Christian civilization. Liberals hence are in the process of rapidly destroying their own 'modernizing' capacity by bringing in other competing civilizations, many with overtly un-western views, to live within European borders.

Despite this, the world is now reverting to the 19th century concept of nationalism. All European races, virtually alone in the world, live in genuine pedigree nations. They are ancestral peoples surrounded by landscapes upon which they have built their own preserved heritage. The inhabitants hence have a shared history (rather than merely shared political values). Most people in developing countries are members no more than tribes. The languages they speak do not match up with the names of the places they are living in, the frontiers of which were decided upon arbitrarily in the 18th and 19th centuries, and in large part by western powers.

Further, most intellectuals in foreign lands are nationalists, since they often oppose the autocratic régimes that govern them and wish to hand back power to their own people.

Some 25 new countries have come into existence since the end of the Cold War. All civil wars in the last decade have been about nationality and sovereignty. No people has been prepared to fight in the cause of membership of supra-national institutions or of multi-culturalism.

Some western academics are becoming increasingly scathing about recent developments. Sir Alfred Sherman points to the danger to social stability and democracy if immigration continues on its present scale. Professor J.P. Duquid of the University of Dundee wrote recently: "Firm action by governments to prevent replacement immigration is obstructed by opinion-leaders whose misguided altruism leads them to favour helping foreigners at the expense of their fellow countrymen ..."

William Pfaff, author of The Wrath of Nations, wrote, in regard to immigration: "It is the duty of a government to be selfish in the sense of looking after its people first... We can be charitable but not if this endangers the well-being of our families or those for whom we are responsible ..."

Ludovic Kennedy also wrote: "In the past immigration has greatly enriched this country, but to allow any more will aggravate what is already a growing lack of balances."

At last, the liberals may be losing their monopoly of the immigration and nationality debate!

Jews celebrate Oxford ban on Irving

HISTORIAN David Irving, as was always predictable, was banned from speaking in a debate at the Oxford Union last month after agitation, largely orchestrated by Jewish groups, caused the Union to withdraw an invitation to the historian.

The cancellation of the debate was made just a day before it was due to be held. It came after tremendous pressure had been applied to get it stopped. At an all-night Union meeting a vote of 95 to 15 was delivered in support of the ban.

David Irving:
Why are they afraid to let him speak?

In a front page report in the Jewish Chronicle on May 11th it was stated that the National Union of Students had welcomed the decision, and - mark these words - "applauded the Union of Jewish Students for spearheading the opposition, which had also included Hindu, Sikh and Muslim students."

So once again we find that coalitions of ethnic minorities in Britain, led by the most powerful and influential minority of all, are able to dictate who may be allowed to speak at a British University. Sad times!

But none of this should excuse the cowardice of indigenous white British members of the student body in caving in to the minority pressure.

Readers of Spearhead will recall that in March the androgenous, partly black American 'pop' idol Michael Jackson was given a huge welcome by the Oxford Union, when he delivered a speech about his unhappy childhood. It just goes to show that these days the Union does not want to engage in really serious discussion about anything but would prefer the presence of a prancing stage performer to that of a learned, if controversial, historical polemicist.

This is just another illustration that Britain has ceased to be an adult country.

This is an abridged reproduction of an article which first appeared in Gothic Ripples newsletter, to which we owe acknowledgements. Gothic Ripples can be obtained from Thorgarth, Greenhow Hill, Harrogate, N. Yorks. HG3 5JQ.

SMOKE AND FLAMES arise from farms far and wide as the foot-and-mouth disease bestrides our land, and sacrificial killing and burning of farm animals, not only those already infected but also those deemed at immediate risk, is decreed as imperative, and proceeds apace. Farmers who have so far escaped a visit of the virus lose their sleep dreading the morning inspection, and those who have had a visit lose more sleep calculating the catastrophic loss of their capital and income. Although not a farmer myself, I live alongside their fears and woes, my home being a former small farm and my nearest neighbour a sheep farmer, and the farm track which connects both of us to the nearest public road being closed by disease restriction notices to deliveries, including that of the postman, so that mail has to be collected from the nearest post office four miles away,

The agricultural calamity has excited the urban zealots of liberalism – hothouse creatures of the concrete jungles who decry and agitate against anything and everything supportive of a national community of Aryans, such as immigration restriction or trade protection, to take advantage of it to declare British agriculture to be outmoded, and best to be allowed, if not encouraged, to die off in favour of importing more or less all our food, while importing more and more persons from abroad to take up jobs and to enrich our culture. An open door to foreign food and foreign settlers are fundamentals of the foreign mindedness of these deracinated frequenters of the bistros and wine bars of the big city who conceive the whole world as their habitat, and the global mobility of goods and bodies and ideas as the only way to peace and progress.

NO LONGER 'USEFUL'

The Independent newspaper is pre-eminently the roosting place of the liberal illuminati. Thus we found in its issue of the 23rd March 2001 a Deborah Orr intoning the last rites for what was once Britain's staple industry, but which now in her emancipated opinion has outlived its usefulness and should not be preserved. Here are a few gems from her wisdom: "The agriculture industry in Britain is not economically viable." "... the tourist trade is expected to expand, unlike poor old agriculture, which is expected to die slowly, quietly and inexorably..."

"Agriculture must struggle on in some form for some time, but only to provide a backdrop to the thrusting young service industry that is really bringing wonga into the rural economy." "Farming is all over bar the shouting, and land-owning is back."

For the apostles of a one-world economy such as this Deborah Orr, it is the economic analysis and the almighty cause of 'cheapness' which count supreme – everything to do with a national and racial heritage which is not to be expressed in pounds and pence,

Britain's farming on fire

The foot-and-mouth crisis, says COLIN JORDAN, has brought out of the woodwork the corrosive urbanite liberals who would like to see our agriculture disappear being despised as relatively insignificant or fanciful illusion. With 'cheap' food available from abroad, the cultivation of our soil and the care and continuance of our herds and flocks is an old-fashioned pastime which no longer pays, and should be discarded, the current foot-and-mouth epidemic being viewed by them as having the advantage of hastening the decline and abandonment of an outdated industry. What they really look forward to is a countryside relegated to the role of an expanse of country clubs, golf courses, theme parks and recreational areas where they can exercise themselves and their dogs, and ramblers from town can be free to roam.

To challenge them first on their own ground of 'cheapness', let it be said that to a very great extent they are vendors of illusion – in that the food in question is cheap in its nutritional content as well as, and because of, its price. In the case of crops, and whether produced at home or abroad, and unless expensively organic, the food is the product of drugged and depleted soil. Subsequently it is subject to extractive and additive processing which devitalises. In the case of meat, the animals from which it is derived in other than organic farming are the victims of chemical treatment of one kind or another, ultimately deleterious to both the animals themselves and the consumers of their flesh,

This preceding paragraph brings us to the question why British livestock are succumbing on such a scale to this foot-and-mouth disease. Could it be that their natural resistance to disease in general has been undermined by modern practices resorted to in order to boost the animals as meat suppliers in compliance with the dogma of liberal capitalism that quantity and cheapness in cash terms count above all else? This is the opinion of a cattleman who provided a long article for the London Sunday Telegraph (4th March 2001). Modern farming methods, he said, subject cows to an unnatural diet of supplements and antibiotics which makes them permanently unhealthy and results in a disease-ridden industry that makes costly epidemics inevitable. "I am nauseated," he said, "by the idea of eating the meat of sick animals pumped full of antibiotics."

If we were not expending such an enormous part of our national resources on alien causes – be it the cost of enforcing coloured immigration on this country and massively subsidising the coloureds here and abroad, or global interventions such as that in Yugoslavia and Iraq – we could, among other things, fund effective research into such disease of animals along with those of humans. There is nothing 'cheap' about being a global busybody and a lady bountiful to internal and external Africans and Asians.

VITAL TO THE NATION

The second and overwhelming argument against those cosmopolitans who contend that we should discard our agriculture because the 'cheapest' food from abroad is best is that a large and thriving agriculture is vital to a nation as the virtual heart of its body politic. A nation needs for its health of mind to have a sufficiently large part of its people bound up in the cyclical processes of Nature in an intercourse of blood and soil, an integration of land and people, whereby there is an organic growth of custom and tradition and perception of identity, the core of heritage; this pulsating to the rest of the population as from a heart, and forming the ethos of the nation. It is thus that patriotism and its component cohesiveness of community are nourished, and without these a nation falls sick, as is the condition of Britain today. Thus a nation's base in a thriving agriculture which the likes of Deborah Orr would deny us is a value completely outside and exceeding the cash evaluations of these cosmopolitans.

The blend of blood and soil and belief essential to a thriving nation is still to be found in the predominantly agricultural Yorkshire Dales in which I live, and where ancestors of mine have lived and farmed time out of mind. Most of the farmers work small hill farms of sheep and cattle. Despite all the deracinating, eroding and corrupting influences of global thought and practice, much of the England of old lives on in them. Many are of families who have farmed here for centuries, quite a number going back to the days of Viking settlement here, recorded in place names and dialect. They know and take pride in their ancestry and its roots in the Dales and cherish old values and habits.

In addition to the spiritual and cultural justification for a flourishing agriculture, there is the issue of national security in respect of our food in the event of dispute or conflict with other countries, and the stimulus to national morale which a degree of independence in this respect brings. The advocates of global fusion fantasise that unrestricted mobility of men and materials throughout the world makes for universal harmony, but both experience and common sense hold otherwise. Independence, rather than dependence, lessens the likelihood of friction.

Furthermore, a British agriculture possessed of that independence can not only aim at the greatest extent of home production sensibly possible – accepting that complete self-sufficiency is likely to be always out of reach – but can gradually increase its content of organic farming which is so desirable if we are to aim at providing the nation with high nutrition free of that chemical treatment of one kind or another which is suspected of contributing to such a vastness of ill-health in this purported year of progress 2001. It may well be that that we have to pay more for more nutritious and harmless food in revolt against the 'cheapness' available in deficient and polluted food, but for anyone who puts high value of his or her health and longevity it is a higher price well worth paying in preference to extravagance on things of lesser importance.

MADHOUSE BRITAIN

WITH Britain's defence budget being trimmed to the bone, it is all a question of sorting out priorities. It has recently been revealed that a dozen servicewomen per year are being given breast implants at a cost of £2,500 a time. The annual bill therefore stands at £30,000.

A DOZEN Bugs Bunny cartoons have been dropped from TV because they are deemed to contain elements of 'racism'.

It is considered that the classic episodes, some dating back 60 years, give an 'unfavourable' portrayal of Blacks and 'Native Americans' (Indians to you). Apparently, in one story, Hiawatha's Rabbit Hunt, Bugs was shown outwitting an Indian (sorry, Native American), and today this is impermissible.

The judge, Simon Coltart, attempted to justify his ruling by saying that the public's "long-term interest" would be better served by the men receiving help on the outside.

Apparently, Immigration thought, from a letter in her bag, that she was seeking to work in this country.

ONCE there would have been no need for this article. In fact, its subject matter would have been unbelievable not too many years ago. Once almost everyone was complacent enough to think that such things only existed in South America or East Asia. Corruption and sleaze in British public affairs seem to have swept up from nowhere, to permeate every aspect of our national life, like a gigantic and all-pervasive tidal wave of green slime.

Besides the blatant examples like the Hamilton case, during which the public learned the interesting information that you can rent an MP just as you rent a taxi, a more subtle culture of deceit seems to have taken over government departments. We are endlessly told of the alleged economic good times we are supposedly enjoying, yet in the villages of western Newcastle such as Benwell, Denton or Gosforth – just as in many other places – less than 25 per cent of the local folk have any earned income. Alas, these Geordies are still foolish enough to elect some New Labour robot – I can't even remember his name – though apparently only a fifth of them voted last time, and the figure will be even lower this time.

The controlled media do take care to get the terminology right, however. Thus Anna Ford will drone on on TV about dissident Serbs boycotting elections in a rigged system, but when the self-same process happens in Britain the boycotters become apathetic couch potatoes!

One major area of corruption in public life is party funding. The two major system parties have moved a great deal from their points of origin to merge, effectively, into one grand coalition of squabbling, pushy lawyers on the make. As has been said many definition, are unlikely to donate to 'local' political parties – unless, of course, a pretty good quid-pro-quo comes their way!

Hence the incredible attraction which both Labour and Tory feel towards millionaires, both parties being seemingly hypnotised by huge wads of cash, as if held in the glance of a snake. Indeed it seems quite likely that if Cap'n Bob Maxwell hadn't fallen or been pushed overboard from his yacht, he'd now be the respected 'Lord Maxwell', New Labour leader in the Upper House!

Surely, only the lure of lucre could explain the appeal of dubious characters like the Hinduja brothers to times in these pages, both are the submissive creatures of the multi-nationals and the U.S. power structure.

Unions' disillusionment

Unions, once the overwhelming contributors to the old-style Labour Party, not unnaturally see little point in supporting a governing clique which has done so little for their members. Likewise, the Conservatives were once backed to the hilt by big business. Until a couple of decades ago there was plenty of British big business willing to donate to the Tories, but after the mis-titled Conservatives' work of demolition, most of our remaining large-scale industry is owned by foreigners. Such firms, by certain members of the Government. Both Gopichand and Srichand Hinduja face investigation for involvement in not one, but two, crooked arms deals back in their native India. But the establishment's political class now seems completely contemptuous about its surrounding web of corruption, a cardinal example of what the ancient Greeks termed hubris, the overweening arrogance that eventually overwhelms all conquerors (globalisers not excepted).

Surprisingly, these would-be immigrants received a helping hand from Maggie "Swamped" Thatcher who sent a little letter to the Government on their behalf, as did Ted Heath. But then not every would-be immigrant has £500 million in the bank!

Culture of secrecy

One of the most disgraceful features of British public life is the manner in which corruption combines with the culture of secrecy. Other countries, notably the U.S.A., may have equally dishonest politicians, but at least wrong-doing there is more easily detected and publicised. Our major financial-political scandals, such as BCCI and Guinness, were only brought to light due to investigations in the U.S. Even India has a more robust approach towards official wrongdoing!

The bribes scandal in the Bofors arms case back there has apparently done no harm whatever to the Hinduja brothers in their numerous meetings with the 'great and bad', including Bill Clinton, George Bush, Al Gore and Michael Heseltine. This is not to mention the ubiquitous Keith Vaz, who usually seems to act as the Hinduja brothers' 'gofer' in the Commons.

In spite of all the scandal, Tony Blair has not seen fit to return Cherie's £1,000 sari, given by the Hinduja's to the couple when they attended a Diwali celebration some time back. Nor has he given back the £2 million that his fixer Lord Levy received from the Hinduja's as a donation to the dismal Dome. By the way, that £2 million gift was towards the Dome's 'Faith Zone', but we all know the real faith of our Lords and Masters: in the power and glory of mammon.

Media pressure

Even more insidious than this, however, is the subtle pressure exerted by media moguls and the soothsayers of capital. Mrs. Smith, of Gasworks Terrace, may vote in the election, while Rupert Murdoch does not, but who will have more influence over government policy? Murdoch's chief lobbyist and policy adviser, Dr. Irwin Stelzer, is a regular visitor to both Nos. 10 and 11 Downing Street. Stelzer, a multi-millionaire in his own right, is reputedly able to walk into the inner sanctums of Prime Ministerial Office whenever he likes. This particularly powerful lobbyist is one of those pushing for acceptance of the 'Star Wars' scheme, covered by John Tyndall elsewhere in this issue.

When Peter Mandelson had his last brush with sleaze, after the loan from Maxwell-linked former Paymaster General Geoffrey Robinson, he reportedly expressed a desire to travel and do some work "helping the underprivileged." In Mandelsonian terms, that probably means anyone who only has one bottle of vintage champagne per week!

Globalists' agenda

But Mandelson's journeys after his resignation had very little to do with the poor, and everything to do with the globalists' agenda. He spent eight days at the Aspen Institute in Colorado, a meeting place for some of the world's most powerful businessmen, where the next steps of globalisation were discussed.

A few weeks later, he popped up at the 1999 Bilderberg meeting, held in conditions of stringent secrecy at a hotel in Sintra, Portugal, before heading for a stay at Lord Rothschild's villa in Corfu. Next he crossed the Atlantic for the Hudson Institute meeting in Washington, whose key man is - Dr. Irwin Stelzer, whom we've already previously encountered. What a small world it is when you're in the power élite!

Rotten to the core! Our entire political system is raddled and moth-eaten by both open sleaze and hidden influence. Sooner rather than later, our people must be given the option of a nobler alternative!

PAID TO WRITE NONSENSE

HAVE YOU ever wondered why in the race debate (if such it can be called) which takes place in the mainstream media liberals and 'anti-racists' - which means almost everyone - adopt arguments of such transparent silliness as to insult the public's intelligence?

To illustrate what I mean, let me take just two examples. One was provided in the leader article of The Spectator of the 5th May, headed 'Townend and the Crusties'. John Townend will of course be instantly recognisable - he's the Tory who dared to say that immigration was endangering Britain's native culture, and then quickly backed down and apologised when Hague threatened to throw him out of the party. As for the 'Crusties', this is what the Spectator leader writer calls the mob who demonstrated against global capitalism on May Day. To that writer, these two parties have in common the fact that they are opposed to the consequences of economic liberalism - specifically the free movement of capital and people.

Leaving aside the former, let us look at what The Spectator has to say about the latter. In reply to Townend, its writer invokes the 'Out-of-Africa' theory of human origins, talking of a species which once "shared roughly the same quotient of body hair and skin pigmentation." He went on to say:-

"There then followed, over hundreds of millennia, a period of dispersal. Some human beings ended up in Northern Europe, where it rains, and they grew pale and blond; others stayed in Africa and developed skins rich in melanin."

The Spectator leader's message clearly is that the enormous diversity of human races is essentially due to geographical and climatic influences. The obvious poppycock of this idea should hardly need explaining. So paleness and blondness were acquired in the northern climate! How then does the writer explain how the Eskimos, who have dwelt in that climate for thousands of years, are noticeably very far from being pale and blond? Then what of South Africans of both British and Afrikaner descent, who dwell in a warm and sunny environment but contain a large portion of people with fair hair, blue eyes and other Nordic characteristics? And the same might be said of a great many European Australians.

These facts clearly establish that physical characteristics are the product, not of geography or climate, but of genes. And the same may be said of mental attributes. How otherwise have Australian Aborigines lived in the same territory and under the same weather as their white counterparts but never developed anything near to comparable brain structures and intellectual or technical skills?

Is the leader writer of The Spectator incapable of perceiving these obvious facts? To that question we will return.

Let us meanwhile read what the same magazine's Editor, Boris Johnson, has to say on the subject of race - again viz-a-viz the Townend controversy. Actually, Johnson was writing in the Daily Telegraph (May 3rd), and his point was to defend Townend's right of free speech (how big of him!), though not his opinions.

In order to make the latter clear, Johnson raised the ancient chestnut of former migrations and invasions to Britain. Referring to Townend, he said:-

"In so far as he mourned our changing 'Anglo-Saxon' culture, he was talking the purest drivel.

"There was certainly a group of immigrants who destroyed our Anglo-Saxon culture, but they were the 20,000 Normans who arrived after 1066, expelled and dispossessed the Anglo-Saxon aristocracy and adulterated the language..."

"No cultural change in the past 50 years, no sprinkling of curry houses, no wave of immigration, comes anywhere near William of Normandy and his knights in the levels of destruction inflicted on our 'Anglo-Saxon culture', and it is ridiculous to suggest otherwise."

It is, needless to say, Mr. Johnson who is talking drivel and being ridiculous. On his own admission, the Normans were a mere 20,000 in number - compared with recent migrations of many millions. Much more to the point, aside from introducing new words into the language, they altered our culture only marginally. The Normans were of Scandinavian origin - in other words very similar to the Celts, Saxons and Norsemen who preceded them. All these groups were branches of the same racial and cultural tree.

Does Mr. Johnson really believe the hogwash he is writing? Or is he merely like a barrister in court whose job it is to defend a client, regardless of his opinions as to the latter's guilt or innocence? In fact, most journalists today are in just that position. They are paid to write for newspapers and magazines which will lose advertising revenue if they print anything remotely smacking of 'racism'. Johnson is, additionally, an aspiring MP - the candidate in Michael Heseltine's former constituency, no less. What happened to Townend has not been lost on him. He, like the Spectator leader writer, knows where his bread is buttered!

IT'S A WHITE PROBLEM, NOT A BLACK PROBLEM!

Our hatred, says MICHAEL WALSH, should not be directed at other races but at the traitors and cowards in our own ranks.

I HAVE always considered that the most difficult task any man could face was to acknowledge defeat at the hands of the enemy. Millions of people of many nations have given their lives to avoid doing so. Many men, the bravest of warriors, have taken their own lives rather than bow to the victor. I stand humble before them, whatever their race.

So what words can convey the feeling of absolute humiliation in conceding that our people's defeat is due not to the superiority of the colonising conquerors but to their own shameful acquiescence?

As a proud European, I find it very difficult to accept that much of the white race today, in evolutionary terms, is probably on the lowest rung of the survival ladder. It is 'the weakest link'. Such a view is no longer confined to the demented souls walking the streets with banners proclaiming: 'The end of the world is nigh'. Nor does it just enjoy currency among the radical left and right. Even in this land so aptly described by Friedrich Nietzsche as 'the land of consummate cant', there is grudging acceptance that Britain has been mortally stricken by a series of self-inflicted wounds that herald its downfall.

BRITAIN THE NEW TITANIC

As a proud White man, I am indignant at the strutting superiority of the colonisers. I burn at the ease with which they assimilate and adorn themselves of benefits provided by the sweat and ingenuity of my compatriots.

I feel humiliated at the contempt with which they hold the White Race in general and its betrayers in particular. Surprisingly, we have much common ground, for the immigrants scorn and deride 'liberals' as much as I do. But I confess to burning from their equal contempt for me – though in my heart I am unable to blame them; they can see no further than my white skin, which in their eyes is the outward appearance of weakness and race-suicide. Triumphalism? On the streets many of them practise it.

National columnists such as John Edwards concede: "The rest of the world has the country marked down as the new Titanic. So they stay at home and watch the bubbles."

I deplore a political correctness that makes it an offence to protect one's property, to defend one's birthright; laws that deny the basic human right to air an opinion. I deplore the persecution of dissidents even when it is based on race, as it is in Britain today. Censorship denies me my freedom as a man and relegates me (and you) to the status of an animal. The 'Mother of Parliaments' has stapled our tongues. How one would wish to be an orphan!

I am outraged at the way in which the racist laws of Britain are selectively applied to distinguish between the indigenous and non-indigenous people. I am angered at the media's racist misrepresentation and censorship, again applied in such a way as to favour one race against the other. I am incensed at the blinkered racist application of the law, the anti-white slant on education, local government and public standards. I am repelled by the gut-wrenching hypocrisy of politicians whose laws impose a racial amalgamation which in their personal lives they reject out of hand.

WHITEWASHED KAFFIRS

I feel disgust at the anti-white apartheid practices of Britain's whitewashed kaffirs, who feel compelled to fawn at any feet provided they are dusky – and the duskier the better.

These are the people ruining Britain – all white!

But what I find most gut-wrenching of all is that none of these crimes against humanity can be laid at the door of a single immigrant! These people are simply and wisely taking advantage of opportunities freely given whilst being protected from all criticism – and who can blame them?

I cannot in my heart condemn asylum-seekers, bogus or otherwise. I cannot criticise immigrants of any kind for trying to improve their chances of survival. They are simply acting in accordance with nature and their gods. A force as old as life itself drives them on, and the Whites are driven before it.

Worse, we flee before the onslaught whilst those caught up in it slavishly curry favour with the vanguard.

We Britons have an old history of sometimes occupying, corrupting and then milking other peoples. I am not, however, a believer in tit-for-tat, and I resent bleeding-heart race-traitors who advocate tit-for-tat to recycle injustice. I recognise the wrongs of yesterday but appreciate that the reprocessing of old stupidities serves only the deathwatch beetle.

All of my anger is reserved for the crass stupidity and blindness of my own kind, who through a combination of treacherous leadership, plebeian moronic self-denial or downright apathy, hasten their people's liquidation as assuredly as Stalin disposed of the Kulaks.

ONGOING EVENTS SHAME BRITAIN

There is nothing perverse that happens today without the tacit nodding head of plebeian apathy and treachery. When an eleven-year-old boy reacting naturally to abuse calls his tormentor a Paki bastard and is dragged before the courts, what more can be said? Has any nation of people on earth, even the most primitive, sunk so appallingly low in terms of apathy or cowardice? See, they betray even their own children!

The brown-noses will have a difficult job pinning a charge of racism on me unless it be reverse racism, for I cannot possibly conceive of any race-nation on earth sinking so low as to persecute a child so young for saying something so innocent of malice. No people in their right mind would allow it.

NEMESIS

I would say that no person on account of their colour should ever stand before any court of British law or have anything to fear from true Britons; their future is as assured as it is safe. They will simply lose that which was not theirs in the first place, and this can be no loss.

Those who should be increasingly enduring sleepless nights are those I foresee standing before the peoples courts. The evidence of their perverse attempts to visit racial and cultural genocide upon their own people will confront them. These will be, to a man and woman, white of skin.

Let them reflect that throughout history countless men and women have danced on air for treachery much less odious.

PEST CONTROL

The traitors' courts will prevail. Neither mankind nor nature has a choice in this. It is the way of the world; it is the counter-balance. It is coming. Most nations have at some time in their history divested themselves of malignant elements; those who failed to do so simply disappeared. Those who survived were the ones which dealt with their traitors. In the main, those who had shamed themselves by collaboration were exposed and ostracised, often exiled. Others were brought before the courts of law and dealt with, often harshly. All too often, mob rule took the upper hand and such culprits were stripped, tarred and feathered, forced to run naked through streets, beaten, even lynched. Could it happen here? Britain is not the first country to be occupied, its laws subverted to outside interests, its people seconded to the occupiers. Why should ours be the first country that fails to react as others have done?

Those of us in this country who have shrugged off apathy, refused to hide behind self-denial, rejected compromise and fought against collusion, will one day stand as saviours of our race and defenders of our national honour. There can be no greater reward for the sacrifices of today. To do

Rebel without a cause

A recent newspaper feature focused on one Brian Wilson who, presumably because of an absolute dearth of talent in the Parliamentary Labour Party, now fills the unlikely role of Minister of State at the Foreign Office. The 52-year-old member for Cunninghame North first achieved fame back in his student days by rushing onto the pitch when the rugby Springboks came to play in Aberdeen, thus demonstrating his woeful ignorance of, and his implacable hatred for, a government which, despite the baleful hostility and contemptible interference of those who should have known better, worked quietly and efficiently for the good of all the races and peoples under its care.

Coincidentally, the same issue of the same newspaper carried a piece from its correspondent in Johannesburg under the caption 'Crime eats at soul of South Africa'. We read that: "It fills the daily papers, dominates dinner party chatter and is evident on every residential street, where electric fences and armed response protection teams are the norm." The epidemic is blamed, of course, on poverty which "... is intense and often getting no better." Predictably the writer fails to mention that, under the eminently sensible system of Separate Development, South Africa was a well managed, rich and prosperous country which could and did afford to improve the living conditions of its poorest folk year on year. We wonder, whether Mr. Wilson has learned something as he has got older. Or was he among the congenital cretins in Trafalgar Square a few weeks ago cheering Nelson Mandela, former terrorist and supreme architect of South Africa's current misery?

One-off jobs

Almost every time another piece of our nation is sold off to a multi-national company, usually accompanied by a government grant to help pay for it, the festivities are attended by a beaming minister. Press and TV are invited; the bunting is everywhere and the champagne flows freely. This, we are told, has been a great day for the community concerned: 4,500 new jobs here, another 1,250 there. And there is John Prescott, or some other bumbling nonentity, rapsodising about how good all this is for Britain.

Unfortunately the Treasury, so free with our money when dealing with foreign enterprises, exercises no power whatever over the world economy, and the multi-nationals are in business only to satisfy their shareholders. Thus, when the downturn begins to bite, global capital starts to look for ways to cut costs, and those very dodgy jobs are the first to go. Strangely, no minister finds time to attend the funeral.

Last year the entertainment group EMI was engaged in unsuccessful merger talks with Time-Warner in the USA. Rachel Brandenburger of Freshfields (solicitors) assisted them in all the legal wrangling and is reported to have been paid the best part of £20 million for her efforts. We would not deny that skill, knowledge and expertise played a vital part in these proceedings. Even so, it seems to us that such payments are possibly even more obscene than the vast amounts 'earned' by EMI's so-called pop stars and the parasites who invent them.

Fifteen 'Lords' a-creeping

'Lord' Stevenson, Chairman of the House of Lords Appointments Commission, when speaking of the fifteen new 'people's peers' that have been selected, and defending the decision not to include your actual ordinary bloke or blokes, observed that: "... we would have to be very, very confident that they would feel comfortable standing up in debates and talking and cutting it." This was, of course, instantly recognisable as Westminster double-speak for: "They might make some sensible but shockingly indiscreet comment or suggestion concerning immigration, race, sexuality or the EU which the press would latch onto and maybe start a debate on a forbidden subject."

Vauxhall Motors (above) is a US-owned company vulnerable to layoffs if its parent should decide to shift production elsewhere in the world (see 'One-off jobs').

And so, after all the New Labour hype, we have got five abject and outright failures – Richard Best, Paul Condon, David Hannay, Elspeth Howe and Herman Ousely, a couple of charity workers and a sprinkling of academics. True to its pathetic form, the Daily Telegraph found no fault with the choice but did make the point that all the selection palaver had not affected the final outcome. In short, like everything else in today's politics, it was a con. In our view today's version of our second chamber has no relevance to the government of the nation, and in future this column will signify its contempt by the use of quotation marks, e.g. 'Lord' or 'Baroness', whenever it stoops to refer to one of these people – until such time as these ridiculous titles are abolished.

N5 DAP...

... is the car registration number sported by a senior police officer in Fife and, if you sort of squint a bit while looking at it, you can just about turn it into 'NSDAP'. This is relevant. The gentleman concerned has written books about the Third Reich and it is reported that the number plate had been a present, a private joke. Now in our view we feel that only a dedicated moron would look upon all this as other than mildly amusing. Sadly, some creatures described as 'race campaigners' – whatever that may mean – find it grossly offensive to ethnic minorities and the families of people who suffered in the last war!

And as regards the last war, let us put these people straight on two counts. Firstly, I bade farewell to a weeping mother. Friends, schoolmates and close relatives were injured or killed, but most of us made it through – believe it or not – without counselling. Secondly, the NSDAP was an association of white European working people, formed after the First World War, which governed Germany between 1933 and 1945. Its merits, misdeeds and achievements are history though still hotly debated. But one thing is certain. It has got absolutely nothing to do with the ethnic minorities living in Great Britain. Anyone who is that easily offended should seriously consider whether they are living in the right country. Under the law, we are required to be polite and tolerant to all but, as yet, we do not have to scrape.

ANYTHING TO DECLARE?

FRANK KIMBAL JOHNSON suggests how candidates should be tackled in the coming election

SO, the three main political parties have signed up not to 'play the race card' in the forthcoming General Election. All of their candidates will now be aware that any reference, however coyly expressed, to the ongoing alien invasion of Britain will be seized upon by the media rat pack and will almost certainly result in their immediate exclusion from the 'Westminster Club'.

Meanwhile the native British are not supposed to notice that many towns and cities are well on the way to becoming, in William Hague's words, a 'foreign country'. They are not supposed to notice that the majority of racist attacks are upon white people; that English is a second language in numerous inner city schools and districts; that the mass media are now awash with multi-racist dogma, and every popular programme is obliged to promote that dogma at whatever cost to our indigenous culture and however insulting to our intelligence. The underlying message from officialdom is that even the pretence of resistance to the alien invasion has been quietly abandoned. From now on, the general public is to be told that the newcomers are making a better job of Britain than its native population has ever managed to do over the last ten centuries or so. Forget those outmoded notions about exporting native genius, expertise and enterprise; our top politicians now insist that importing Third World ways is the key to all Britain's problems. Given time, these 'inverted missionaries' seem to be saying, the immigrants will make Britain as good a place to live as the countries they are now deserting in droves. Oh really? Then why aren't the British frantically emigrating to Africa or Asia?

But unlike party politicians, the voters are free to raise any issues they regard as altogether crucial to the future of their homeland. The preservation of our racial and national identity is the central issue of contemporary politics.. Accordingly, all election candidates should be prepared to answer a few searching questions on the subject:-

- How many immigrants have entered Britain since 1960?
- During that period, how many were returned to their own country?
- How many have entered during the last twelve months?
- How many have been returned to their own country within the last twelve months?

If the candidate cannot/will not answer these factual questions, he/she is either incompetent (since figures are readily available) or extremely anxious to avoid the challenges they must present, namely:-

Since you claim to represent the real concerns of the British people, would you support a national referendum asking the native population of this country these questions:-

- (a) Would you prefer the population of all our towns and cities to be predominantly of British (i.e. English, Welsh, Scottish or Irish) ancestry?

(b) Would you support a humane and generously assisted repatriation programme for Third World immigrants?

(c) In the meantime, do you agree that no individual or organization should be penalised for discrimination in favour of the native people of Britain?

The answers any politicians give to these questions will at once tell you if they have anything else to say worth listening to. They must be seen to choose between representing the real interests of the British people or grovelling to the Race Relations pundits and party managers. And while we're on the subject, when did the British people sign up to this massive alien invasion of their homeland?

Tyndall portrait for sale

Some British National Party supporters have got together to produce and market a framed portrait of the party's founder and present Spearhead publisher and editor John Tyndall (shown above). Mr. Tyndall himself neither initiated nor has taken any part in this project, much though he appreciates the gesture. Copies of the portrait are signed by him personally and also by the artist Anthony Payne.

The price per copy is £40.00 (post-free) UK only. Please make cheques or POs out to 'Save Our Sterling' and send orders to PO Box 56, Bexleyheath, Kent DA7 6ZQ. In accordance with Mr. Tyndall's wishes, all profits will go to the BNP.

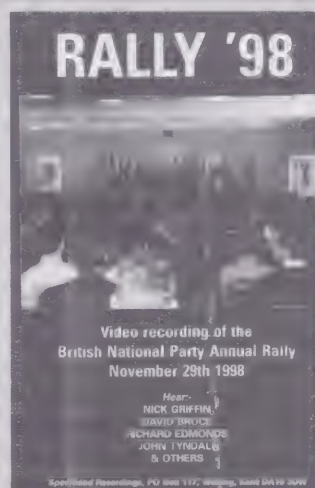

BNP Rally Video

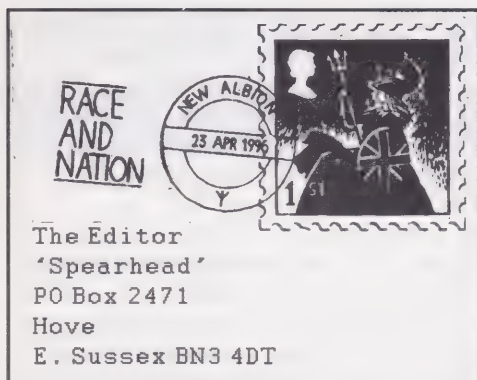

Rally '98 is the video recording of the British National Party's Annual Rally, taking place on the 29th November 1998. After a decision by the BNP not to put this film on the market, its production and distribution were taken over by Spearhead.

The rally was possibly the best in the party's history. It was held at a venue in the West Midlands after successful attempts had been made by political opponents, including the Board of Deputies of British Jews, to get previous bookings of venues cancelled. After many interesting reports by regional and departmental representatives, the film features speeches by Nick Griffin (then Publicity Director), Richard Edmonds (then National Organiser) and John Tyndall (then party leader). An especially touching feature is the hugely successful collection appeal by Dave Bruce, which raised a staggering £12,000 for the then all-important Euro Election Fund. Less than a month afterwards, Dave was no longer with us, having been tragically taken away by an unexpected heart attack.

See and hear the speakers at this stirring event as if you were there!

Rally '98 is available at £15.87 post-free, with a 30 per cent discount for all orders of three or over. Make cheques out to Spearhead Recordings and send to PO Box 2471, Hove, E. Sussex BN3 4DT.

SIR: Crawley, West Sussex, calls to mind none of the horrors more usually associated with Britain's inner-city hell-holes – unless, of course, you happen to live there. The following abridged news items are taken from a randomly selected single issue of the Crawley Observer.

(1) Aptly named Terry Lawless smashed a glass door at McDonalds, causing damage estimated at £3,500, and then bit a police constable's finger. Thankfully, he has been ordered to attend an 'anger management programme'; (2) Thirty-three year-old Sonia Grant trashed her room at Le Meridien Hotel, Gatwick, and subsequently bit the hand of a WPC at the Police Station. She had been to the airport to arrange a flight to Jamaica where her mother had been taken ill; (3) Vera Stephens, 83, was repeatedly punched and indecently assaulted after a young man, described as round faced with short dark hair, tricked his way into her home; (4) Detectives are still hunting for the gunman who shot and seriously wounded a thirty-three year-old father of four; (5) An eighteen year-old girl was followed and confronted by "an aggressive black man" who threatened her and made off with her purse containing £25; (6) Gatwick: While using the lift at the South Terminal, a woman was punched in the face and her handbag stolen. The attacker is described as an Afro-Caribbean male with short hair parted in three places; (7) A young man in his early twenties was brutally stabbed nine times while walking home in the small hours of the morning; (8) French fisherman Eric Piedfroid was arrested after his Edinburgh flight landed at Gatwick. He was drunk and had punched another passenger. Later, at Crawley Police Station, he punched WPC Nicole Godwin in the mouth and chipped her tooth; (9) A sixteen year-old boy was brutally assaulted – attacked with bottles and punched – by three men (not described); (10) An elderly woman was threatened with a fake gun by two boys, around fourteen years old, one white, one Asian.

Looking back over the above, is it not amazing that anyone still wants to join the police force?

SIR: I was tickled by your article last month 'New party gets the smear treatment'. You may be interested to know that the Freedom Party's representatives here in the West Midlands were quite pleased with the coverage they got in the Sunday Mercury in which they were linked with 'Nazis', 'Fascists', 'Hitler sympathisers' and 'extremism'. They were heard saying: "It's all publicity, and that's what we need." This just shows the blatant hypocrisy of these people, who claimed when they set their party up that the purpose was to get away from the nasty image given by the media to the BNP and to become 'respectable'. Who in their right mind can support such people? It is clear that the sole reason for their splinter group is to damage the BNP.

KEITH AXON

SIR: As you rightly say ('We plan to close them down', in last month's issue) the attempted sabotage of patriotic parties by state security services occurs in almost every country. A report in the Sunday Telegraph of the 22nd April showed how the authorities in Germany are operating a scheme to 'buy off' nationalists – described, as always, as 'neo-nazis' – by payments in Deutschmarks amounting to £30,000 each in return for betraying their comrades and working for the police. The scheme has provoked some controversy and by no means all those opposed to nationalism are in favour of it. According to the report, however, Fritz Stepper, a spokesman for the Verfassungschutz (Germany's equivalent of MI5) has defended the scheme, saying that in response to the 'hotline' set up to receive calls offering collaboration hundreds had phoned in in the first few hours. The report went on to say that: "Neo-nazis arrested for crimes of violence and racial prejudice are also being targeted. Officials visit them in prison to persuade them to change their ways." This fits in with what your article said about so-called 'nationalists' who have been involved in criminal activity being subject to blackmail by police whereby in return for their help in working against their former friends they either receive reduced punishments or get off scot-free. The impression the authorities like to give in defending this bribery and corruption is that the targeted people are ones who would genuinely like to abandon their awful political allegiances and 'reform', just requiring a little 'encouragement' to risk reprisals by their former comrades by breaking free. In reality, they are mostly the kind of psychopathic characters described in your article, who know no code of loyalty but would do anything for personal gain. Far from being the admirable 'repenting sinners' suggested, they are just self-seeking scumbags who deserve our contempt. Like their counterparts in this country, they "have their price," and the state security forces know it.

SIR: Many thanks for the latest edition of Spearhead and especially for the splendid article on infiltration of our ranks. No doubt, like the proverbial pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, there awaits the egregious Mr. Grieve the customary knighthood, awarded for services rendered. True, most states operate on the same principle: all establishments will stop at nothing to preserve themselves, but the British state performs these acts with an unparalleled flair for hypocrisy. All our actions are cloaked in such moral deception; all is for the best; the maintenance of the status-quo never enters the equation at all.

T.D. FOSTER

SIR: A few months ago you made a point about the Asian police sergeant who had been convicted "beyond all doubt" by three commanders of the Met. In fact, after a long struggle Gurpal Viridi was cleared by an industrial tribunal. He has now been reinstated.

You might have missed the (to me) crucial fact that at the police enquiry Viridi had not been allowed to call the vital evidence that he had not been 'in touch' with his computer when some of the offensive mail containing racist remarks against him had apparently been sent on it.

I should really be glad if you would make amends to his name now, in common fairness.

LESLIE VON GOETZ (Mrs.)

SIR: It is reported that cheap foreign meat supplied to the Army was the original source of the current foot-and-mouth epidemic. This raises an important question: why are our soldiers expected to eat cheap foreign meat? Surely they deserve the very best meat – and by that I mean British!

RONALD G.W. RICKCORD
Newport Pagnell, Bucks.

SIR: John Prescott, in explaining his action in punching the egg-thrower in Rhyl, claims that having been hit by the egg – an egg, mark you! – he felt in real danger and was seized by the need to defend himself.

Poor darling! I wonder how he would feel if he were subject to the constant physical threats endured by BNP activists over these many years: people like Michael Davidson, who lost the sight of an eye after a vicious attack by left-wing thugs when canvassing during an election – or for that matter John Tyndall and his wife, who were rushed by a mob of about 35-40 in East London a few years ago and beaten about the head and body.

Yet when BNP members fight back in self-defence against this constant aggression they are described by Labour Party folk and others of the left as 'nazi thugs' and the like. Aren't we seeing double-standards here?

G.L. WOODHOUSE
Hull, East Yorks.

SIR: It seems strange that newspaper pundits, while being strongly critical of the Blair Government, seem almost unanimous in praising it and its predecessor for the fact that we have a 'strong economy'.

I see little signs of that strength, what with British manufacturing industry – always the basis of our economic health – in seemingly permanent decline.

TYNDALL AT CROYDON

JOHN TYNDALL was the guest speaker at a lively meeting of Croydon BNP on April 26th. He opened by saying that recent news highlighted the utter paralysis of the political system, citing the failure to cope with the foot-and-mouth crisis, the chaos in public transport and education and further signs of collapse in manufacturing industry and public order – while in the meantime the asylum-seekers continued to pour in. He condemned especially the Tories for their cowardice when faced with the 'racist' charge, and conjured up an unlikely image of Drake, when faced with the Spanish Armada sailing up the Channel, shirking the job of going out and defending the country against it by saying: "I don't want to seem like a racist!" Our ancestors were made of sterner stuff than the leaders of today, he said.

Tyndall alluded to Foreign Secretary Robin

Cook's attempt to deny the facts of race. Cook, he said, is a Scot. How does he explain that a people like the Scots numbering only five million have made a greater contribution to the progress of mankind – in science, in invention, in literature, and in prowess in war than the many hundreds of millions of Africa and Asia put together.

About 35 people were present and the collection raised £250.

Paul Golding speaks at high school

PAUL GOLDING, British National Party Director of Publicity, was invited to speak to a politics assembly at a high school in Ealing last month. This resulted in a razor-sharp debate from the pupils. He gave explanations as to why the 'multi-cultural' society was completely artificial and a construct of those who seek to destroy all forms of ethnic identity. He said that recent events in Oldham and elsewhere are just the tip of the iceberg in what will be a future torn by conflict between different ethnic groups – as has always been the case in artificial multi-racial societies like former Yugoslavia.

THINGS MOVING IN SOUTHEND

SOUTHEND (Essex) is the latest area to see the British National party on the move. The unit held a well attended meeting on the 14th of May, with supporters from the town and surrounding districts. BNP Group Development Officer Tony Lecomber spoke about the issues facing people in the area, which has become a major collection centre for so-called asylum-seekers. In addition, it was observed that large numbers of Blacks had been moving to the area recently as part of the overspill from London.

In fact, many Southend people are themselves exiled Londoners, who have had ample experience of the multi-racial paradise in the Capital, and are now finding that there is no escape from it. In Southend there is nowhere further to run – except into the sea!

Local members were very pleased to see activists from Basildon, who had driven across to support them, and also the party's Lewisham candidate Barry Roberts, who came a fair way to contribute to the meeting.

The meeting, which was the inaugural one of the group, concluded with a pleasant social get-together in the bar. Sales of publications were brisk and some new members joined up on the spot.

Andy Batty, the group's organiser, says that the immediate priority is to increase membership, and he has called on everyone to work hard leafleting. He says that meetings will soon be held on a regular basis.

The Eleventh Hour

The Eleventh Hour has been described as the 'Bible' of the British National Party. First published in 1988, the latest (1998) edition has been updated to take in the many new developments on the political scene occurring since. Written by the founder of the British National Party, John Tyndall, the book gives comprehensive coverage of all the major current issues affecting Britain. It delves into the ideologies of liberalism, conservatism and the left, and also examines that of British Nationalism and its background. It contains extensive analyses of the British economy and political system. It looks at issues connected with freedom and order, the mass media, the environment, race and immigration, Northern Ireland, the Commonwealth, foreign policy and defence. It also gives a detailed outline of the development of the BNP and its predecessor organisations in Britain.

The Eleventh Hour runs to 537 pages. It is partly autobiographical, giving an account of the author's origins, early political awakening and subsequent life's work.

party's smaller ones, is to be commended for managing to fight the two seats of Sunderland North and Sunderland South – having not contested any at all in 1997. It is very welcome that the party is fighting a seat in Wales (Newport West), whereas there was no Welsh seat among the 55 contested nationwide in 1997.

The main policies on which the BNP will be campaigning in the election will be:-

Immigration: An immediate halt to all further non-white immigration and a system of voluntary resettlement of non-white ethnic groups now in the UK.

Europe: Withdrawal from the European Union and the restoration of family and trading ties with Australia, Canada and New Zealand.

Law and Order: The restoration of capital punishment for premeditated murder and (optional to judges) for serious sexual attacks on young children.

The Economy: The restoration of British manufacturing industry and farming as top priorities – where necessary by the exclusion of imported goods.

Education: A return to traditional teaching methods, including the restoration of discipline in the classroom.

Northern Ireland: An uncompromising commitment to the Union, together with the elimination of the IRA by all means necessary.

Defence: The restoration of National Service and withdrawal from NATO.

Foreign Affairs: An end to subservience to the USA and to interference in foreign quarrels where no British interest is at stake.

SPEARHEAD SUPPORT FUND

Income from the sales of our magazine is not enough to cover full production and administrative costs. We therefore rely on regular donations from our supporters so that we may remain solvent.

Also, because of the controversial nature of the opinions expressed in these columns, it is impossible to induce wholesale distributors to handle the magazine. Hence our need for additional financial support.

Please send all contributions to Spearhead, PO Box 2471, Hove, East Sussex BN3 4DT. Please note that receipts are not normally sent for donations of less than £10 unless specifically requested – in which case an SAE would be much appreciated. Thanks.

ARE YOU ONE OF THOSE WHO WON'T BE VOTING?

It's being forecast that the turnout in this month's General Election could well be the lowest in British political history. This is a measure of how low the politicians and political parties have sunk in public esteem. How many times have you heard people saying: "I shan't be voting. What's the use? They're all the same. And they never listen to what the people want anyway."

Or – "There just isn't a party that represents my views"?

This attitude is understandable. Many share it.

But it's not an excuse for doing nothing.

You may be one of those lucky electors who have a British National Party candidate standing in your area. If you are, and if you agree with many – if not all – that party's views, you should stir yourself to go out and vote for its candidate.

"But the candidate can't win," you may be saying. Well, that isn't certain – if everyone who agreed with BNP policies voted BNP its candidates could indeed win. But that's not really the point. A respectable vote for the BNP could enormously boost its public profile and get the country to sit up and take notice. This way, the issues which the major politicians have been sweeping under the carpet will have to be discussed.

And you can help this happen. In fact, a vote for the BNP is far less wasted than one for Lab/Lib/Con. So make yours count – for a change!

But why stop there? Why not join the BNP and help build it up so that one day it can become a major force in the country and really start to influence events – even win political power and put the decline of Britain into reverse.

Think about it – and do something!

THE BRITISH NATIONAL PARTY IS BRITAIN'S LAST HOPE – AND IT NEEDS PEOPLE LIKE YOU!
